Dear Jason,

I was slightly surprised by your email, given that we were working under the assumption that our conditions were clear and had been approved.

I now see that you need a few clarifications to get approval from the Board and that's perfectly ok. Let me dive into your two main questions.

1. How the work is split among our team members.

Marcelo de Paulos and I co-create every single recommendation we provide you guys. We have complementary backgrounds in politics, communication, marketing, business, and tech, so it's very hard to point out exactly where one's responsibility ends and the other's starts. Our work should be seen as one.

For all purposes, Marcelo Parrocha is coming out of our pockets. He's doing strictly operational work allowing us to focus on more strategic subjects, but not burdening GETTR with any additional costs.

2. The scope -- or more than "in-country vendor relationships"

It was part of our initial proposal to help GETTR select, negotiate and hire local vendors - and we did. Until then, we would fill in to do most of the work that was supposed to be done by them, as a way of helping you guys operate in Brazil -- as we did negotiating media contracts (scope of an ad agency), procuring organic media opportunities (scope of PR firm) or helping GETTR sort out the particularities of the entangled Brazilian political and legal landscape (scope of a law firm), just to name a few.

And, although we will definitely have to hire other vendors - in which we will keep assisting - once the vendors are hired, most of the operational work might be taken care of by them. But the strategy part isn't. That's what we do. There's more to understanding GETTR, Brazil, and how each of these vendors performs than simply "in-country vendor relationships."

We will keep guiding GT Lawyers, Script, PR, and every other vendor from a strategic standpoint and making sure they're performing well and in a manner aligned with GETTR's best interests - without the language barrier. The alternative would be hiring an executive team in Brazil - and once it has, we will definitely shift our role to advisors, as you see fit - but I can assure you that this will be a hard task by itself that will cost GETTR more than the current structure.

On top of that, a big chunk of the current proposal is based on the Influencer Program -- which we have envisioned from day one. We are proposing to oversee not only the work of vendors but of the GETTR team as well. This is where some of the executive experience we have comes in handy. (Do you remember Marcelo's thorough recommendations on the KPIs, right?) This Program is set to be valuable for every geography, not just Brazil. We believe this should be able to enhance the value of our delivery under the new contract in a very favorable way for GETTR.

And that doesn't even cover everything... We will be offering you the best possible advice when it comes to every single initiative related to the country, in a way no vendor or GETTR team member might: the constant-changing political dynamics, events, personalities (such as how to best employ the contribution of our allies -- like Sergio), opportunities in areas beyond the field of politics (such as the medical congress, the UFC/Jiu-Jitsu fighters, the soccer YouTuber etc), out-of-the-box ideas (such as the presidential election poll).

And more than anything: we treat GETTR's money as our own. We have been saving and will keep saving every single penny everywhere we can and we make sure GETTR gets the best deal and best bang for the buck in any deal we do in Brazil. We do that both using our reputation and our negotiation skills and I can say without hesitation that we saved 10 times more money in Brazil than what we charged for our time. If you have any questions about that, just look at the deals we have been getting and compare them to what you had before we got into this project. Just the Jovem Pan discount alone should be more than enough.

And then encompassing all this, there are our politics, influencers, and business networks in Brazil.

I guess that covers most of the bases. Let me know if you need any additional help pitching our contribution to the Board and we'll be happy to meet to further clarify anything you deem necessary.

Once you have the proposal approved, please let us know as we're eager and excited to jump back in again and make GETTR skyrocket in Brazil!

Best,
Paulo
